

Enacting a Georgia Work Credit: An Economic Boost to Long County

Work Credit Could Benefit More Than a Million Georgia Families

Georgia is missing out on a tool used by 29 other states to strengthen hardworking families, boost local economies and help communities thrive. A Georgia Work Credit (or state Earned Income Tax Credit) provides a bottom-up tax cut to workers earning low wages such as sales clerks, construction workers and nurses. The added funds help workers and their families afford basic necessities like child care, as well as larger investments like a reliable car to get to work or a down payment on a first home. A Georgia Work Credit would:

- Provide a bottom-up tax cut to Georgia families who work but still struggle to make ends meet because of low-wage jobs
- Grow Georgia's middle class by helping workers afford the basics and putting them on firmer footing to climb the economic ladder
- Boost local economies and businesses by putting more disposable income into the pockets of Georgia consumers

Who Benefits in Long County?

1,541 Families* would benefit from a Georgia Work Credit

$445,781* could go into the local economy from a Georgia Work Credit

Estimates based on a 10% refundable credit. A lower state match or nonrefundable credit would provide smaller, though still meaningful, benefits.*

The Credit Supports Working Families

Imagine a young couple with a new child. Mom works part-time as a home health aide. Dad works at a local restaurant. Their combined income is $29,000. A 10% Georgia Work Credit could lower their state income tax by $250. They use the savings for child care, transportation and other investments to stay employed and move to the middle class.

Let's join 29 other states and pass a Georgia Work Credit.
